PRISONERS A VOICE AND VISIBILITY

Robert 'Seth' Hayes is one of the longest-held political prisoners in the USA. Born in the Bronx in 1948, Seth was imprisoned due to his activity in the Black Panther Party and the Black Liberation Army, a fighting formation that grew out of the Black liberation movement of the 1960s.

It was in the period of social upheaval in the late 1960s that Seth radicalized and joined the Black Panther Party and later the Black Liberation Army. Drafted into the U.S. Army and sent off to fight in Vietnam, Seth was wounded and awarded a variety of military awards including the Purple Heart, the National Defense Service Medal, the Vietnam Service Medal, and the Vietnam Campaign Medal. Back in the U.S., when riots exploded across the nation in response to the April 4th, 1968 assassination of Martin Luther King, Seth's unit was ordered to assist in putting down the massive rebellions, which took place and spread across the United States. According to Seth, "It was the saddest day of my life, and I could never identify again with the aims of the armed forces or the government."

After the military, Seth was swept up in the Black Liberation movement and joined the Black Panther Party. He worked in the free breakfast for children program and began dedicating his life to the betterment of Black people. His knowledge of the effects of racism on the Black community convinced him that the Black Panthers' program of community service and community self-defense was what was needed. It was during this period the US government stepped up a program known as COINTELPRO (Counter Intelligence Program.) This program was designed to neutralize and destroy civil rights and progressive organizations, which were deemed as a threat to the American society. As part of COINTELPRO, leaders of these movements were victims of illegal operations, up to and including political assassinations.

The US government waged an open war against the Black Liberation movement, specifically the Black Panther Party. Throughout the country, leaders of the Panthers were being killed or falsely accused of crimes they did not commit. Robert Seth Hayes was surrounded by people who fell victim to illegal activities of the US government. Fearing further attacks, he went underground, believing it a better way to protect the work of the Black Panther Party and the Black movement in general. Many Panthers joined Hayes and others like him- and its then that an offshoot of the Black Panther Party was created- the Black Liberation Army (BLA).

The newly formed BLA believed that "the character of reformism is based on unprincipled class collaboration with our enemy" and asserted the following principles:

1. That we are anti-capitalist, anti-imperialist, anti-racist, and anti-sexist.
2. That we must of necessity strive for the abolishment of these systems and for the institution of Socialistic relationships in which Black people have total and absolute control over their own destiny as a people.
3. That in order to abolish our systems of oppression, we must utilize the science of class struggle, develop this science as it relates to our unique national condition.

On June 5, 1973, a transit officer, Sidney Thompson was shot and killed while trying to detain two individuals at transit station in the Bronx. Seth and another person were arrested for the death of the transit officer. Seth was convicted of the crime, in addition to eight counts of attempted murder of a NYC police officer, weapons possession, grand theft and collective association. He was then sentenced to 25 years to life in prison.

Robert Seth Hayes had two children prior to his arrest and imprisonment, and he has remained closely involved their lives and upbringing, despite the difficulties presented by his long incarceration. His son, Chunga, lives and works in Atlanta. His daughter, Crystal, herself
